

Archetype Annotation in “A Fine Son” by Roald Dahl

One archetype in “A Fine Son” is the overprotective parent. This figure represents the universal tendency of parents to shelter their children from danger, even at the cost of independence. In the story, the father’s protective instincts highlight both love and fear, showing how deep parental attachment can sometimes become suffocating. The archetype resonates because many readers recognize this tension in real-life parent–child relationships. Dahl uses it to illustrate the fine balance between nurturing and over-controlling. Through the father, the story emphasizes how protection can be both a blessing and a burden. Ultimately, this archetype serves as a cautionary reminder that love must allow space for growth.

Seven-Sentence Paragraph on an Archetype

Let’s explore The Loving Mother (Klara), as she embodies profound emotional depth:

Klara represents the archetype of the Loving Mother, her maternal instinct both fragile and fierce as she agonizes over the newborn after losing three children. Her grief is palpable, and her fervent prayers reveal the depth of a mother's love clinging to hope amid despair. She listens to the doctor's assurances, yet cannot fully trust them—her heart has already been broken too many times. The gentle kiss her husband finally offers does little to soothe her shaken spirit. In that suppressed moment, Klara becomes a symbol of both human vulnerability and enduring strength. It is through her eyes that we sense the weight of history unfolding, though she remains oblivious to the true nature of the child she cradles. In Klara’s agonizing hope, Dahl reminds us how love can be both the most beautiful and most tragic force of all.
